

Celebrations and goodbyes

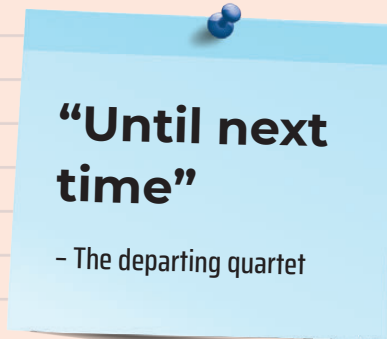

Noida breaks into celebrations

March roared in like a tech tornado! Manas descended upon Mobile World Congress in Barcelona, returning with tales that would make gadget enthusiasts weep: Lenovo's Rollable OLED and Tri-Fold laptops sitting pretty alongside Samsung's Galaxy S25 Edge and mysterious XR Project Mohan. Back home, our YouTube channels hit a milestone sweeter than Holi sweets: 100K for Hindi and a six-month reign as India's #1 tech channels that has competitors looking nervously over their shoulders. Comscore data dropped like a mic, with 10.1 million unique visitors cementing Digit's tech journalism supremacy. The R&R Holi party turned into a carnival celebration, with Mustafa and Joyeeta snagging Ace Performer awards amid color-splattered chaos. Meanwhile, the Delhi office test lab expansion looks like a design-admin wrestling match, with blueprints flying, measurements contested, and enough creative tension. Just another month in the Digit universe, where work looks suspiciously like controlled pandemonium.

The winds of change have swept through Team Digit in Mumbai as we bid farewell to three of our most dedicated and talented colleagues – Dhriti, Prakrit, and Ali. While their departure leaves a void that will be hard to fill, we take this moment to celebrate their incredible contributions and the indelible mark they have left on the team.

The indomitable workhorse

If there was ever a team member who embodied relentless dedication, it was Dhriti. Her work ethic was unparalleled – she not only met deadlines but often beat them, always eager to take on more responsibilities. Her ability to set new standards of excellence made her both an inspiration and a friendly competitor among her peers.

Dhriti's expertise in smartphone and audio reviews was second to none. She had a keen eye for detail and an uncanny ability to dissect the most minute aspects of a device, presenting her analysis with clarity and precision. Whether it was testing the latest flagship or delving into the nitty-gritty of an intricate audio driver, Dhriti approached every review with meticulous attention and a passion that shone through in her work. Her reviews weren't just informative; they were benchmarks for the industry.

Her absence will be deeply felt, but her legacy of excellence will continue to inspire those who follow in her footsteps.

The dynamic duo of video production

A successful tech publication is not just about words; it's also about visuals, and that's where Prakrit and Ali excelled. The duo made up the video production team at Digit's Mumbai office, bringing stories to life through their lenses and editing prowess. Whether it was a crisp product showcase, a deep-dive explainer, or an engaging review, their videos carried a signature quality – polished, insightful, and compelling.

Working behind the scenes, Prakrit and Ali often burned the midnight oil, ensuring that content met publishing embargoes while maintaining the high production value that Digit is known for. Their knack for innovation allowed them to push the boundaries of tech storytelling, turning complex features into visually stunning narratives that captured the audience's attention. They also wore the editorial hat time and again when a product which was of their interest, showed up at the Test Centre.

Their commitment to the craft was evident in every frame they captured and every transition they meticulously fine-tuned. From handling the cameras with finesse to editing videos seamlessly, Prakrit and Ali were truly a force to be reckoned with. Their camaraderie, creativity, and technical expertise will be sorely missed, and replacing their combined skill set is no easy task.

Well, adios from me too

While Dhriti, Prakrit, and Ali left the office earlier in the month, me, Mithun, Jayesh, and Sagar held the fort in Mumbai. But, I guess, all good things come to an end. After working on over 30 issues of the magazine that I grew up reading, it's time to say goodbye. No matter where I, or the rest of the folks go, the love for Digit will remain. You will see us lurking in the Discord servers and comments of our videos, taking the case of our dear friends, who, over the years, have become our family. Until next time.
