

Of new office space, lab dreams, stolen wheels, and fresh faces

It's been a slow month in Mumbai, as the office's in a transition phase, moving into newer premises – more on that hopefully in our next update. Meanwhile, Mithun's been tasked with extra administrative duties in ensuring the new office has everything we need, while we carefully transfer testing equipment, studio setup and storeroom paraphernalia through Mumbai's sorry excuse for roads.

Mithun visited Comic Con Mumbai 2025, where he briefly caught up with a few Digit Veterans (Dhriti, Manish and Satvik) and spent a Saturday full of reminiscing and, well, catching up.

Since the day Sagar started working at Digit, relocating from Bengaluru to Mumbai, the poor guy hadn't gone home to meet his parents in Gujarat. So taking advantage of a couple of long weekends in the month of April, the prodigal son announced his return back home. Such was his joy, that he came to Digit bringing fresh thepla and undhiyu for everyone!

Jayesh was caught up with interviewing a whole bunch of people to hopefully get someone to join before June 2025 Anniversary Issue work began. Otherwise, the only thing that gave him some joy this past month was earning an ace in a competitive match on CS2. Yeah, miracles do happen sometimes!

In Noida, however, April arrived with the sweet sound of construction finally breaking ground on our long-awaited

"Computex shopping list 101"

Delhi Test Labs, though the team debate over whether the "ceremonial first hammer swing" should've been live-streamed continues to divide the office.

Rumours also began swirling about Mithun and Yash gearing up for Computex 2025. As the duo ordered shiny new business cards, their desks mysteriously accumulated Taiwan travel guides, MRT maps dog-eared around the nearest bubble-tea stalls, and a browser history full of searches like "how many gadgets can fit in one suitcase?" and "customs duty for RGB keyboards (asking for a friend)." Lab regulars have started a running tally of how many times Mithun slips "Taipei nightlife reconnaissance" into casual conversation, while Yash has begun timing tea breaks to mimic Taiwan time zones – purely to "avoid jet-lag," he claims. Meanwhile, the rest of the team is quietly compiling a top-secret please-bring-back wishlist – equal parts hardware unicorns and obscure night-market snacks – to be dispatched from a throwaway email address just before they board their flights, and a threat of public shaming if they return empty-handed.

The month wasn't without its share of unexpected drama, as Nobil's beloved bike pulled an Easter disappearing act – vanishing from outside his home while chocolate eggs were being hunted elsewhere. What began as genuine distress has evolved into the office's favourite conspiracy theory: Nobil's suspiciously thorough detective agency hiring (complete with dramatic phone calls just within earshot) paired with his not-so-subtle hints about 400cc dreams. The team's now taking bets on whether his increasingly elaborate "search updates" are performance art for an eventual crowdfunding campaign. His desktop wallpaper mysteriously changing to high-resolution 400cc models hasn't exactly helped his case of supposed devastation.

Fresh energy arrived in the form of Ayaan Rashid and Abhishek Bajpai, who survived their baptism-by-testing during what might be our busiest product month yet. Elsewhere, SKOAR's ambassadors packed bags for Calcutta's BGMI showdown, while Siddharth nervously inherited Satvik's Radio Mirchi throne, his first recording with Manas producing enough bloopers to launch a separate podcast entirely. Between stolen transportation, airwave debuts, and gadget tsunamis, April proved once again that at Digit, chaos isn't a bug – it's our most reliable feature.
