

Ammunition packages

Cartridges usually came in packages of ten—such as these for the British-made Enfield rifle—or in wooden cases of a thousand. Where wagons could not go, pack mules might carry the ammunition cases forward.

Wagon trains

Marching armies would be followed by a seemingly interminable procession of white-topped wagons, a hundred of them for each mile of road. If the wagons rolled along in single file, they might reach back for 20 or even 30 miles (32–48km), since up to 3,000 wagons could accompany an army. While the army's infantrymen each carried three days' rations and 40 cartridges, the wagons carried the tons of extra food, ammunition, medical supplies, and
