

Within the mine. Col. Pleasants superintending the arrival of Powder

Carrying powder into the mine.
The soldiers detailed for this duty carried the powder - a keg in either end of a grain bag - thrown across the shoulder. A portion of the "covered way" along which they had to pass, was exposed to the enemies fire. At the dangerous points they would watch their opportunity and dash over the exposed ground into comparative safety.

Inside the mine

War artist Alfred Waud made this sketch with accompanying notes. It shows Lieutenant Colonel Henry Pleasants as he supervised the laying of powder kegs in the mine shaft that later became the Crater.