

AFTER

Most Confederate commerce raiders were lost during or soon after the war, but their legacy still lingers.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS

After the war, the U.S. government claimed war damages from Britain for compromising her neutrality by knowingly permitting the Alabama and the Florida to be built in England. The dispute escalated to a dangerous level, with some senators demanding that Britain relinquish Canada as payment, before the 1871 Treaty of Washington established an international tribunal to arbitrate the "Alabama Claims." In the end, the U.S. was awarded $15.5 million, and the case helped introduce the principle of arbitration in matters of international law.

FINAL RESTING PLACES

The Florida sank in 1864, after a collision off Newport News, Virginia—possibly a deliberate act to keep the ship from being returned to Brazil and re-entering Confederate service. The Shenandoah was sold by the U.S. government to the Sultan of Zanzibar, renamed El Majidi, and sank in the 1870s after a typhoon drove it onto an East African reef. And in 1984, the French navy discovered the *Alabama lying beneath 200ft (60m) of water off Cherbourg.
