

AFTER

The Union victory at Mobile Bay was one of a series of Southern defeats in the summer of 1864 that helped ensure Lincoln's victory in the upcoming election.

FORTS CAPTURED

Victorious at sea, the Union forces completed the capture of Forts Morgan, Gaines, and Powell by the end of the month. Together with Sherman's capture of Atlanta in late August and Union advances on other fronts, Farragut's success maintained the crushing Union pressure on the South.

SEALING THE BLOCKADE

The last port on the Atlantic seaboard was Wilmington, North Carolina, through which some supplies could reach Lee's embattled Army of Northern Virginia. After the powerful Confederate ship CSS Albemarle was sunk in October, Union forces were able to close in on Wilmington's outpost Fort Fisher. The first attacks in December were unsuccessful, but a renewed assault in January 1865 brought Fort Fisher's surrender (see The Carolinas and Alabama).

PETERSBURG CAMPAIGN

On the war's main land battlefield around Petersburg, Virginia, Grant's relentless siege was supplemented by a series of attacks around the perimeter of the Petersburg position. These failed to encircle Petersburg itself and were halted in late October as winter set in. Full-scale fighting was resumed in late March 1865, when the Confederate forces were quickly defeated (see The Fall of Petersburg and Richmond).
