

AFTER

The collapse of Hood's Tennessee Campaign spelled the end of major fighting in that state—and very different ends for the two commanding generals.

TENNESSEE CONCLUSION

In early January 1865, General Hood would tender his resignation, his career now in ruins. In March, General Thomas would receive the "Thanks of Congress" for his victory at Nashville.

END OF AN ARMY

The Army of Tennessee's demoralized survivors—those who didn't head for home after the disaster at Nashville—were continually harried by Union forces as they retreated south. They might have been completely destroyed were it not for Major General Nathan Bedford Forrest and his cavalry who kept much of the pursuit at bay. Many soldiers limped barefoot through the ice until they reached Tupelo, Mississippi. In March 1865, when they joined General Johnston for the last campaign in the Carolinas (see The Carolinas and Alabama), they mustered only 4,500—ten percent of the force that Hood had commanded.
