

"Redeeming" the South

For many white Southerners, Reconstruction was a period of political uncertainty, poverty, and momentous social change. Although they had lost the war, they attempted to maintain traditions of white control, using desperate means to "redeem" the South from Northern domination.