

AFTER

The key Confederate strategists and commanders were well aware of the Union's material advantages.

PUSH FOR VICTORY

When General Robert E. Lee assumed command of the Army of Northern Virginia in June 1862, one of his chief goals was to win swift battlefield victories. These, he hoped, would shatter enemy morale before the Confederacy collapsed under the weight of Northern industrial superiority.

31,246
MILES of railroad crisscrossed the North. In the South, by contrast, there were just 9,283 miles of railroad, less than 30 percent of the Northern total.

GUERRILLA WARFARE

The wide expanse of Confederate territory, especially in the West, made it perfect for guerrilla activity (see Bloody Missouri). This successfully hampered Federal operations by tying down large numbers of Union troops in occupation and garrison duties. But the guerrillas were not above preying on Southern civilians as well as Northern soldiers, which made them a problematic military tool.
