

to another on the battlefield. The intensely regimented system of drill evolutions allowed units to maintain their organization and coordinate the firing of their weapons. Unfortunately, officers received little formal instruction in how to use terrain or what sorts of movements were most advantageous in which circumstances. Even so, rudimentary training through parade-ground drill was better than no training at all, and McClellan's program also included some target practice, mock battles, and training marches.

Cannon squad during drill

Aiming accurately, and rapidly firing and reloading artillery weapons demanded a high standard of teamwork from the crew, all the more so in difficult battle conditions under enemy fire.