

fight. As late as the Appomattox campaign in 1865, when Lee's troops went hungry at Amelia Court House, it was largely due to the misdirection of some of their rations. Poor Confederate staffwork, not scarcity, had caused the supply problem.

Warfare by rail

The "General Haupt" was a specially built wood-burning military locomotive. It was named after Herman Haupt, the engineer who headed the Union's bureau for constructing and running military railroads.
