

AFTER

Kentucky's Unionism was a strategic blow to the Confederacy, but its Unionists became increasingly unhappy with the Federal war effort.

FORTS HENRY AND DONELSON

The Tennessee and Cumberland rivers provided convenient lines of advance for Federal forces. On February 6, 1862, Ulysses S. Grant led the capture of Fort Henry and received the surrender of Fort Donelson Fall of Fort Henry on February 16. These captures were the first substantial Union military successes of the war.

KENTUCKY'S DISSATISFACTION

Despite their importance to the early Union war effort, many Kentuckians became ever more disenchanted with the Lincoln administration as it moved in an increasingly anti-slavery direction. In the 1864 election (see Lincoln Prevails), McClellan received 61,000 civilian votes from Kentucky, compared to 26,000 for Lincoln, the state's native son.

QUANTRILL'S RAIDS

William Quantrill was the most controversial of the guerrilla "bushwhackers" who operated in Missouri and Kansas during the war. His exploits included attacks on Independence, Missouri, and Lawrence, Kansas (see Bloody Missouri).
