

exemption from the draft (military service) for planters with 20 or more enslaved people—motivated by Confederate fears that slaves would revolt or escape if unsupervised—caused great resentment. The ability of the wealthy to pay others to perform their military service for them was seen as unfair and led to draft evasion; it was eventually abandoned. Yet the Confederates fielded a more egalitarian army than that of the North, with conscription applied more consistently across society, and the mercenary motives that drew so many of the poor into the Union Army ranks were less common.

FURLOUGH An enlisted man's leave was called a furlough. A soldier on leave left his weapons in camp and carried papers describing his appearance and giving his unit and his departure and return dates.
