

AFTER

In the Battle of Shiloh, the Union army lost over 13,000 men—casualties and prisoners—while the Confederates had fewer than 11,000 losses. It took time for the reality of the Confederate defeat to be acknowledged.

AFTERMATH OF THE BATTLE

Ulysses S. Grant came under severe criticism in the Northern press, with reports exaggerating the unpreparedness of Union troops. It was even rumored that he had been drunk. Lincoln continued to support him, however, stating, "I can't spare this man, he fights."

After the battle, Halleck, relegating Grant to second in command, led a cautious advance on Corinth. Rather than face a siege, Beauregard withdrew south to Tupelo, Mississippi, in late May. For this, he was fired by President Davis, who appointed Bragg in his place.

The Union fleet engaged in a series of actions on the Mississippi (see Action on the Mississippi River). On June 6, they took Memphis, where Grant, restored four days later as commander of the Federal Army of the Tennessee, made his headquarters.
