

shifting his supply base to the James River. Lee, however, was determined to continue his offensive.

Malvern Hill

Frontal assaults on Malvern Hill, a position defended by powerful Union artillery, cost the Confederates dearly. General D. H. Hill later said of the battle: "It was not war—it was murder."