

Lee astride Traveler

General Lee was deeply attached to his gray stallion Traveler, his mount from the fall of 1861. However, for much of the campaign in Maryland, Lee could not ride because he had broken a bone in his hand.

A shrinking force

Many of the Confederate troops were euphoric as a result of their victories through the summer, and advanced into Maryland with enthusiasm. But others were tired of soldiering barefoot on an empty stomach and reluctant to venture beyond the limits of the Confederacy. While Lee called for stiff disciplinary action against
