

organized secret rings to send messages, and move sympathizers, agents, and escaped prisoners between North and South.

When spies were caught, their gender often determined their treatment. Women were usually released after brief incarceration: Greenhow was held for nine months, Boyd for two. But male spies were dealt with more harshly. Timothy Webster, a Union agent sent to the South by Pinkerton in 1861, was arrested, tried, and hanged by the Confederates the following year. Even scouts on horseback, if caught out of uniform, could face execution.

Mapmaker's sketchbook

This annotated sketch of terrain and military movements was made by Jedediah Hotchkiss, who worked as a mapmaker for the Confederates. He made the first detailed maps of the Shenandoah Valley.