

A battle in three stages

The fighting began at dawn on the Union right, moved to the center, then in the afternoon to the Union left, when Burnside's men finally managed to cross Antietam Creek.

Holding the sunken road

It was 9:30 a.m. before a Union division attacked the Confederate center, held by 2,500 men under Major General D. H. Hill. Holding a sunken wagon road that, with good reason, became known as Bloody Lane, Hill's outnumbered infantry repulsed a series of Union assaults, inflicting some 3,000 casualties on their enemy before
