

HORACE GREELEY

In 1831, Horace Greeley moved from New Hampshire to New York City where he founded the news and literary journal, the New Yorker. He went on to edit the Whig Party's campaign paper, The Log Cabin, before setting up the New York Tribune in 1841. For the next 30 years he advocated an eclectic array of political and social causes and used his paper to oppose the "slave power" that ruled the nation. An early convert to the Republican Party, he offered his printing presses to the party to mass-produce campaign material. After the Civil War, Greeley tried to challenge President Ulysses S. Grant in the 1872 campaign. Ridiculed and soundly defeated, he died soon after the election.
