

Stonewall Jackson. Could his life have been spared till the close of this cruel war, the unanimous voice of a grateful people would have proclaimed him chief ruler of the nation.”

COLONEL ABRAM FULKERSON, A FORMER STUDENT OF JACKSON'S, IN A LETTER TO HIS WIFE ON MAY 18, 1863, VIRGINIA MILITARY INSTITUTE ARCHIVES

Misdirected fire

After routing the Union Eleventh Corps in a surprise attack, Jackson grew impatient with the assault's progress when darkness fell. On reconnaissance near his own front line, he was mortally wounded by Confederate fire.