

(1.6km) to the Union center. With bands playing and banners snapping in the breeze, the Southern line moved forward. Union defenders in Winfield S. Hancock's Second Corps felt a sense of awe at the approach of this grand assault.

When their enemies were about a third of the way across the field, Union artillery opened up with a vengeance, ripping great holes in the advancing gray ranks. The gaps filled, and the Confederates kept coming. As they crossed the Emmitsburg Road, Union infantry joined in with devastating volleys. Some of the men in blue chanted "Fredericksburg, Fredericksburg!" in reference to the recent Union defeat in December the previous year. Now it was their turn to be victorious.

160,000 The number of men fielded by the two armies at Gettysburg, roughly 70,000 Confederate and 90,000 Union troops. About 51,000 became casualties – killed, wounded, or captured.

Napoleon gun-howitzer

U.S.-made versions of the French-designed 12-pounder (5.5kg) Model 1857 Napoleon gun-howitzer were the war's most widely used field artillery weapon, seeing service with both North and South.