

then turned south toward Hagerstown and the Shenandoah Valley, from which it had come. The line of ambulances filled with wounded stretched back for 17 miles (27km) along the road.

Meade's army had also suffered badly, and he followed too cautiously, much to the exasperation of Lincoln, who saw another opportunity to crush Lee north of the Potomac River lost.

Visual record

Photographers visited the Gettysburg battlefield in the aftermath of the battle, documenting scenes like this of a dead Confederate sharpshooter. His body has been moved and posed among the rocks of Devil's Den.
