

Patched up

With the Union blockade biting ever deeper, the South, which produced most of the world's raw cotton, found itself starved of the finished fabric. Clothes, like this dress, had to be endlessly patched and repatched.