

War-weary People

The Civil War was a “people’s war” fought between two republics, both considered democratic if you were white and male. This meant that public morale was as important to the war efforts of both sides as the fortunes of their armies. By the third year of the conflict, war weariness was taking a heavy toll.