

CONFEDERATE CAVALRY OFFICER (1833-1916)

JOHN S. MOSBY

A conventional cavalryman and aide to Jeb Stuart early in the war, Mosby quickly made a name for himself as an intelligence-gatherer and impressed Robert E. Lee so much that he was given command of the 43rd Battalion Virginia Cavalry, soon known as "Mosby's Rangers." His most daring exploit was the capture of Union general Edwin Stoughton in his bed, roused with a slap to his rear. Mosby survived the war, became a Republican, and befriended Ulysses S. Grant. He said in 1894, "I always understood that we went to War on account of the thing we quarreled with the North about. I never heard of any other cause of quarrel than slavery."
