

in cutting Butler off from his base. He further pummeled Butler near Ware Bottom Church on May 20. After that, the Union general was happy to regain the safety of his camp at Bermuda Hundred. With barely half Butler's numbers, Beauregard simply walled him in there, building a line of fortifications across the base of the peninsula. Beauregard had "corked" Butler up, Grant ruefully acknowledged, as if in a bottle.