

Marion is a trapeze artist at a failing circus. She lives in a trailer, and leads a lonely existence dancing on her own and wandering the streets of Berlin.

Wenders dedicated his movie to three "filmmaking angels," directors whose work inspired him. The first is Yasujiro Ozu, who showed how to depict the quiet desperation of the mundane.

The second, François Truffaut, demonstrated how to film the reality of children as a profound experience. The third, Andrei Tarkovsky, created slow-paced meditations full of spiritual yearning. Rainer Maria Rilke once wrote that "Physical pleasure... is a great unending experience, which is given us, a knowing of the world, the fullness and the glory of all knowing." Falk's joy in the simple experience of tasting coffee is spiritual and drives home the idea that to have experience at all is a wonder of being alive. ■

Wim Wenders

Director

Born in Düsseldorf, Germany, in 1945, Wim Wenders is known for his lush, lyrical filmmaking. He studied medicine and philosophy at university before dropping out to become a painter. However, cinema became his focus and he enrolled in the University of Television and Film Munich (HFF). Wenders soon became one of the leading lights of the New German Cinema movement. The director first came to prominence with his feature The Goalkeeper's Fear of the Penalty Kick, based on a novel by Peter Handke. The English-language Paris, Texas, with a screenplay by Sam Shepard, brought him international fame. He has also made documentaries, the most successful of which was Buena Vista Social Club, about a group of aging musicians in Havana, Cuba.
