

Of Trailer Delays, Mango Diplomacy, and Apple Watch's Unsolved Mysteries

May erupted with Rockstar Games delivering the ultimate love-hate moment – postponing GTA VI while simultaneously dropping Trailer 2 because nothing says “forgive us” quite like another cinematic masterpiece that makes the wait even more excruciating. The office collectively groaned and cheered in equal measure, with heated debates about whether the delay meant perfection or corporate torture.

Meanwhile, Yash and Mustafa embarked on what might be our most Instagram-worthy assignment yet: dragging the Oppo Find X8 Ultra to Panikot, Haryana’s stunning landscapes. Joined by Apurva and his scene-stealing duo Lulu and Elle, the shoot turned into equal parts tech review and impromptu dog photography session – with the pups arguably delivering better on-camera presence than some of our usual subjects. Check out their video on our YouTube channel.

The talent influx continued as Krishika arrived from Times Shopping Guide, diving headfirst into video production with the kind of enthusiasm that makes veterans nostalgic. Joining us in Mumbai, fresh from university, Vyom achieved what might be publishing folklore, simultaneously crafting cover stories for both Digit and SKOAR in the same issue, a feat that has editors questioning the space-time continuum.

Our Instagram broadcast channel launched to wild success, feeding everyone’s insatiable appetite for behind-the-scenes chaos. Krishna sir’s AI reels started racking up millions of views and earning him the title “Pookie Gangster” (we’re still processing that one). The Hindi Instagram hit 150K followers, proving our multilingual domination strategy isn’t just working, it’s thriving.

Abhishek’s automotive debut with the Kia Carens Clavis tech features went flawlessly, but his parallel Apple Watch hunt has become the stuff of office legend. His systematic desk-by-desk searches, increasingly desperate inquiries, and creative attempts to convince colleagues to “temporarily loan” their wearables have provided daily entertainment. At this point, we’re considering making it a reality show.

Computex delivered pure gold as Mithun and Yash witnessed tech industry surrealism: Jensen Huang graciously accepted green mangoes from MediaTek’s CEO Rick Tsai on stage, while the show floor showcased PC mods that blurred the line between technology and art installation. Their updates had the home team oscillating between professional envy and genuine bewilderment at the international tech carnival.

Back home, Google I/O unleashed its annual AI avalanche, with Android 16 previews and search revolution announcements that sent our coverage team into overdrive. And in Noida, Yetnesh rallied the troops for Doom the Dark Ages livestream, because nothing says “work-life balance” quite like coordinated demon-slaying sessions.

Meanwhile, the Mumbai boys finished packing up their bags and lots of equipment and product storage boxes to finally move to the new office in Mumbai, under the threat of unseasonal early onset monsoon. Amidst churning out laptop explainers, suddenly Sagar was contemplating longer commutes on his bike across pot-hole ridden excuses for roads. Mithun and Jayesh, who live at the opposite ends of the suburban railway line, with the new office bang in the centre, were contemplating how best to tweak their respective commutes. While all the packed boxes have made it to the new place, unpacking their contents to find them new homes is another matter. What if something is lost in transit?! Stay tuned for next month’s update.

Between analyzing new features, crafting explainer videos, and decoding Google’s latest alphabet soup of products, May proved once again that in the Digit universe, chaos management isn’t just a skill, it’s our core competency.

QUOTE OF THE MONTH

“Jony Ive is back with a bang!”