

Fire alarms & empty office

August arrived with the kind of plot twists that screenwriters dream of! Ashish Singh pulled off the impossible – landing an exclusive interview with Telecom Minister Jyotiraditya Scindia while making his video debut, proving that sometimes the stars align for epic content moments.

Meanwhile, Nobil's "accidental" fire alarm testing incident in the Noida office has been officially declared a long planned conspiracy by him to secure his spot in these very pages of Digit Diary – mission accomplished, you magnificent chaos agent, Mr Nobil. What will you do next month to get featured in the pages of Digit, one wonders?

As Manas went on a well-earned holiday (his first in over three years), and Siddharth went to China on a secret mission which remains classified, one that we can't discuss quite yet, all hell broke loose in Mumbai as the monsoon cranked up its fury in the penultimate week of the month – causing a deluge of 600+ mm of rainfall in just 4 days. The result of which was utter chaos, where Jayesh, Baiju and Vyom couldn't get out of their homes because of severe waterlogging, only Mithun managing to brave (and conquer) the rising water levels to capture a rare sight – an empty Mumbai office!

On August 19th, when authorities issued a red alert for water logging, the Mumbai office was empty Yash triumphantly returned post-injury, only to watch karma deliver swift justice when Abhishek's "Langda Aam" jokes backfired spectacularly, twisting the exact same ankle the very next day. The office collectively decided the universe has a wicked sense of humour.

The month brought our most significant farewell as we bid goodbye to Deepak, whose five-year journey with Digit reads like a masterclass in quiet excellence. His bio speaks of passion and emerging tech trends, but those words barely capture the man who became our display maestro, north star, and the straight-shooting voice of reason in our beautiful chaos. Never one for unnecessary words, when Deepak spoke, confusion fled and clarity reigned, like an arrow finding its mark every single time. His eye for detail transformed our special projects, his mentorship shaped our standards, and his dedication to testing the latest display technology set benchmarks we're still trying to match. Deepak embodied the spirit of Digit perfectly, and while his departure leaves a void, we'll carry forward his legacy of precision, integrity, and unwavering commitment to technological truth.

Fresh energy arrived via Divyanshi, our new laptops and PC specialist, who'll be tag-teaming with Mithun while bringing serious gaming credentials to the mix. But August's crown jewel was our epic celebration party, commemorating India's No. 1 tech site status with the kind of Friday night revelry that had everyone questioning their weekend recovery abilities.

As for the highlight of this past month? Hands down it has to be Ashish unleashing a Prabhudeva-inspired dance sequence so spectacular it could've launched a Bollywood career. Between ministerial interviews, fire alarm conspiracies, waterlogged office premises, and editorial dance battles, August proved once again that at Digit, even our celebrations and the mundanely normal are legendary occasions that leave a memorable impression.
