

The Digit Show goes live!

October felt like a month of firsts – first TV show, first steps inside a chip fab, first time a white towel doubled as a passport-photo studio – it was a wild ride, let me tell you. Earlier last month, Jayesh walked into Intel’s Ocotillo campus in Arizona, zipped into a bunny suit – think PPE, but for silicon – and stepped into a clean room cathedral where wafers glide and robots whisper. He came back calling it “every tech nerd’s wet dream,” and judging by the grin he wore for days, we’re inclined to agree. On another factory floor altogether, Vyom spent a day at WOL3D’s BRAHMA facility, surrounded by hundreds of 3D printers moving in perfect rhythm, turning digital dreams into tangible reality, layer by patient layer. The kicker wasn’t the mechanical symphony, but the eco-friendly twist – the filament is cornstarch, not petroleum plastic. Somewhere between the hum and that detail, he felt the cultural shift from “Where can I buy this?” to “Can I make this myself?”

Far from production lines and clean rooms, Mustafa took a postcard of a trip through Northern Ireland, complete with calm roads, kind people, and always-breezy weather. The Game of Thrones studio tour with Realme delivered sets, statues, and cinematic vibes that can make anyone feel like a resident of Westeros; the North Sea by Dunluce Castle and the Giant’s Causeway was the showstopper. Evenings meant good food, cheerful bars, and streets that quieted after 6 PM. He may have gone overboard with shopping – his suitcase barely made it home – but every souvenir felt like a story. Back in the realm of everyday logistics turned comedy, Yash decided to port from Jio to Airtel and ran into a familiar hurdle: the SIM agent needed a white-background passport photo. Lacking one, he borrowed a white towel from a kind bystander, rallied the team to hold it up, and posed on the pavement while a growing audience looked on. The network switched; the dignity mostly did, too.

Yash took probably the most unconventional passport photo ever taken by anyone in the team so far. Maximum jugaad for maximum efficiency!

Not all fieldwork rewarded the hustle. Mithun flew to Dubai at a moment’s notice, carting a suitcase of gear to cover a hush-hush something, only to be told on arrival that he couldn’t film, publish, or even hint at it. Peak frustration, maximum self-control.

Meanwhile, we levelled up from digital to broadcast as The Digit Show premiered on Times Now in a Saturday 8:30 AM slot, bringing reviews, news, first looks, and tech-trend conversations into living rooms across India. Back at HQ, Digit Zero1 Awards prep turned the office into organised chaos. Vasan is knee-deep in TV and audio testing protocols. Divyanshi practically lives inside laptop benchmarking suites. Everyone else is juggling award ideation and shooting promos, building toward what’s shaping up to be our most spectacular edition yet.

Out in the field, Abhishek, Krishika, and Nobil pulled a 12-hour marathon at India Mobile Congress (IMC 2025), hopping booths and capturing show-floor content that kept our social feeds buzzing. And when the lights dimmed, Diwali brought a warm Pooja, then food that vanished too fast, tambola drama, pop-up shopping stalls, dance-floor mayhem, and the kind of laughter that reminds us why this team feels like family. October’s throughline was simple at best, full of curiosity, scrappiness, discipline – and all of us showing up, together.
