

AI films, no birthdays and Zero1 madness to the max

November moved fast, loud, and occasionally off-script – basically a normal month at Digit, in other words.

Vyom kicked things off in Mumbai, where he walked into India's first AI Film Festival with low expectations and a rain-splattered shoulder. Inside the Royal Opera House, he found a surprisingly global crowd – creators from Morocco, Greece, Dubai, and everywhere in between – plus a panel featuring Shakun Batra, Karan Anshuman, and Tanmay Bhat debating the future of AI storytelling. The 14 films screened later were visually slick but emotionally... still buffering. Yet the room's energy left him with more optimism than he arrived with, which, for Vyom, is a plot twist.

Jayesh, meanwhile, was having a very different kind of cinematic experience – deep inside Qualcomm's HQ, touring labs that looked straight out of a tech-noir thriller. He got a rare peek into the stress-testing gauntlet behind Snapdragon X2 Elite laptops: power-measurement rigs that resembled spacecraft wiring, pitch-dark chambers for camera tests, and engineers casually breaking devices on purpose. By the end, he said he finally understood “why these chips survive our torture tests” – and also why Qualcomm's security badges are not to be messed with.

Mithun was buried under an avalanche of products for Digit Zero1 Awards

On the opposite end of the seriousness spectrum, Yash flew to Singapore and promptly got emotionally hijacked by Universal Studios. The rides were wild, the sets were insane, and the inner nerd was at full horsepower. The highlight was a face-to-face moment with Bumblebee, but the lowlight was Yash openly admitting he prefers Decepticons. (This information is now public. Autobots, do with it what you will.)

Back at HQ, Divyanshi entered what can only be described as Laptop Limbo. With Zero1 Awards testing in full swing, she attempted the impossible – five laptops at once. Screens everywhere, wires blooming like sci-fi vines, and a slightly haunted look in her eyes. Yash caught her on camera and immediately posted it on Instagram, officially turning her desk into a meme.

November also delivered its fair share of chaos. Abhishek dramatically missed his Goa flight – not because of traffic, weather, or delays, but because time waged psychological warfare and won. Zero1 testing turned the office into a battlefield of cables, timers, charts, and arguments about decimal points – Mithun was perpetually lost under a pile of product boxes for most of the month. Ashish's birthday party never happened because no one could find a date that worked for more than two people. And through it all, Apurva moved around the office with his new portable air purifier like a wellness superhero, purifying air nobody realised needed purifying.

Looking back, flights were missed, robots were met, laptops multiplied, birthdays evaporated, and the office air was, allegedly, cleaner. As the month closed, with heavy hearts we bid farewell to Mustafa, the creative force behind Digit's YouTube explosion and the infectious energy driving our reels into the stratosphere. That youthful burst, that boundless creativity, those relentless ideas, we wish him bon voyage. d
