

Of bandages, deadlines and one constantly missing chair

December arrived with deadlines in one hand and bandages in the other – and somehow, that felt appropriate.

The month truly began at ground level, with Priyanka's daily battle known internally as The Great Chair Hunt. Fresh off maternity leave, she'd briefly tasted the quiet dignity of work-from-home life before Zero1 Awards pulled her back into the office orbit. When she returned, she had to figure out where to sit – and more importantly on which chair. Every morning now includes polite hellos, a slow scan of desks that clearly belong to someone, and the quiet realization that she belongs everywhere and nowhere at once. Wedged between laptops, surrounded by other people's plants and cushions, she's become Digit's most productive nomad – powered less by ergonomics and more by sharp one-liners, affectionate roasting, and laughter that finds her no matter where she sits. Her strategy for January? Come early to win a chair and make it her own, once and for all.

Aman and Narendar strapped up

December also delivered a long-awaited full-circle moment for Divyanshi. At 13, she dreamt of being a journalist and seeing herself on TV. This past month, that dream quietly ticked itself off the list. Episode 11 of The Digit Show marked her television debut – watched not alone, but alongside her entire family on a Saturday morning. No breaking news ticker, no dramatic reveal – just one of those deeply personal milestones that feel bigger because they arrive without fanfare.

Then there was Vyom, who stepped briefly away from chasing stories to cross a very different stage. Degree in hand, cap tossed, he officially graduated – an achievement made even more surreal by having Dr. S. Jaishankar as chief guest. Three years of caffeine-fuelled deadlines and relentless curiosity led to a pause, a photograph, and then straight back to tinkering. Some habits refuse to graduate.

Yash's December unfolded on the road, shooting sponsored content in Jaipur with the kind of pressure that only hundreds of curious onlookers can provide – especially when you're delivering a PTC in front of Hawa Mahal. Things escalated at a concert shoot, where a phone's 200MP telephoto camera proved so impressive it briefly outperformed human relationships. Technology remains undefeated.

Not everyone ended the year upright. Aman Rashid's attempt at recovering from experiencing his very first Zero1 Awards took a dramatic sequel turn – same foot, same spot, upgraded injury. Ligament tear, now featuring a fracture. He wasn't alone. Narendar, Aman Shukla, and Manas also wrapped up 2025 with plasters and braces, turning the office into something between a newsroom and a rehab ward.

And threading it all together was December 3rd – the Digit Zero1 Awards night. Months of planning, stress, and behind-the-scenes chaos culminated in a spectacle. December didn't slow us down. It reminded us why we do this. Bruised, chairless, occasionally limping – but proud. Onward to 2026. 📺
