

MOTO G67 POWER vs SAMSUNG GALAXY M17

Which one should you buy at ₹15,000?

Siddharth Chauhan | editor@digit.in Budget phones have always lived in this strange pocket of expectation where everyone wants everything, but nobody wants to spend beyond a certain line. And somehow, every year, one or two devices step into the spotlight and make you rethink what fifteen thousand rupees can actually buy. This time, the Moto G67 Power and the Samsung Galaxy M17 are the ones doing that.

I've been switching between both for a few days now, trying to get a feel of each phone. These are two devices sitting roughly at the same price. Motorola is leaning heavily into practicality: battery, software, endurance and a slightly nostalgic sense of familiarity. Samsung is doing what Samsung usually does well: polish the experience until it feels like you paid more than you did.

Design and in-hand feel

The Samsung Galaxy M17 almost feels like it belongs to a different category altogether. Flatter, lighter at 192 grams, and noticeably sleeker. It looks more modern, almost minimalist, without trying too hard. The plastic back is clean but plain; no texture, no surprises. Yet the refinement comes through in places like the Gorilla Glass Victus at the front and the IP54 rating. You rarely see Victus on a phone at this price, and it silently elevates the M17's presence.

The Moto G67 Power has that unmistakable Motorola warmth to it. Curved sides. A soft eco-leather back. Colours that feel like they were picked by someone who still enjoys picking colours. The texture gives it a subtle fabric-