Apple's macOS 26.4 finally brings charge limit feature to MacBook

Apple has very quietly added a highly requested Charge Limit feature to the Mac with the first beta of macOS 26.4, bringing battery health controls in line with the iPhone and iPad. The update allows MacBook users to set a charging cap between 80 and 100 percent directly from the Battery settings menu. Once the feature is activated, the laptop will stop charging slightly before the selected limit, helping reduce long term battery wear for those who keep their devices plugged in for extended hours. Apple says the system may occasionally charge to 100 percent to maintain accurate battery health readings. The company has also extended Charge Limit controls to the Shortcuts app, enabling users to automate charging behaviour based on time, location, or specific routines, adding a layer of flexibility that could benefit power users and everyday professionals alike. tingurl.com/s17gsa

WhatsApp gets Group Message History feature

WhatsApp has introduced Group Message History to help new members catch up on ongoing conversations without disrupting the chat. When someone joins a group, admins and members can choose to share between 25 and 100 recent messages, giving essential context instead of the full history. Shared messages are clearly marked with timestamps and sender details, and the entire process remains end to end encrypted. Admins can disable the feature for members, though they retain control to share history when required. The rollout is happening gradually.
