

Of coincidences, comebacks and closures that hit hard

March didn't arrive loudly. It slipped in, settled at desks, and started stitching together moments that felt too coincidental, too personal, and occasionally too absurd to ignore. If January was about beginnings, March was about connections. Some rediscovered, others unexpectedly created.

For Madhav, the month delivered one of those rare, improbable overlaps life occasionally throws your way. A casual scroll through Instagram turned into a double take. A familiar office layout. A quick call led to a surprising confirmation. His long-lost school friend, now working in the same office building – just a few floors apart. What started as confusion turned into an instant reunion. In a city that rarely slows down, March offered him a reminder that distance doesn't always mean disconnection. Sometimes, it just takes an elevator ride.

Divyanshi's March, meanwhile, came with its own plot twist, courtesy an eye allergy that decided to make itself known at the worst possible time. A red, painful bump, right at the corner of the eye. Not exactly camera-friendly. But the shoot went on. Makeup did its job, professionalism took over, and somewhere between takes and touch-ups, she found herself humming The Life of a Showgirl. The irony wasn't lost on her, of course, sometimes the performance matters more than the problem.

Vyom chose March to revisit an older version of himself. After more than two years away, he stepped back into the world of competitive cubing. The results? Not quite peak form. Not even close. But that wasn't the point. The muscle memory was rusty, the timings slower, but the joy was intact. There's something quietly reassuring about returning to something you once loved and realising it still fits, albeit imperfectly.

Priyanka, on the other hand, decided to outsmart corporate caution. A pre-Holi advisory email laid down the rules: no colours, no water balloons, no pichkaris. Festive spirit was allowed, but execution restricted. Her work-around? Sticky notes. Torn, placed, and unapologetically festive. Faces became canvases, compliance remained technically intact, and Holi found a way in anyway. It wasn't rebellion, just clever creative interpretation.

But March wasn't all lightness. It carried a goodbye that lingered a little longer. Kunal Saroj, the graphics designer who had quietly become the backbone of Digit's visual identity, moved on to a new chapter. For many, especially Narender, his departure wasn't just a professional shift – it was personal. Tributes flowed, memories surfaced, and one thing became clear: Kunal wasn't just part of the system – he was the system for many of its moving parts.

As one chapter closed, another began. Charu stepped in, bringing fresh energy into the design team – a reminder that while roles evolve, the rhythm continues.

That was March. Coincidences, comebacks, quiet resilience, creative loopholes, and a farewell that mattered. Not loud. Not dramatic. Just real, in all the ways that count.

Thanks a ton, Kunal!
