

A TRAVEL STORY THAT WORKS

HEMANI AND SAGAR ARE BUILDING A LIFE ON THE ROAD

For Hemani and Sagar, the journey into content creation began with a leap. “We started documenting our journeys not with a strategy, but with sincerity, and that authenticity became our biggest strength,” they say. What started as a personal pursuit – Hemani stepping away from radio and Sagar leaving a stable engineering career – gradually evolved into a shared life on the road. Their story is less about travel, and more about choosing a life built on intention, experience, and honesty.

How would you describe the content that you create?

Our content is a blend of storytelling, lived experiences, and real emotions rather than just showcasing destinations. We show both the beautiful and the messy sides of full-time travel – whether it’s chasing sunsets in the mountains or figuring out life out of suitcases. Our audience connects with us not just for travel inspiration, but for the honesty and life lessons that come with it.

Is your creator journey centered around a core mission?

Yes, very much. Our mission is to inspire people to live more intentionally and to break free from conventional timelines if that’s what their heart truly wants. We want to show that there is no “one way” to live life. Whether it’s leaving a stable job, choosing unconventional paths, or simply prioritizing experiences over possessions – we want people to feel empowered to make choices that align with their happiness. Over time, we’ve received messages from people who’ve taken their first solo trips, pursued creative careers, or simply started living more consciously – and that, to us, is the biggest impact.

What are some misconceptions about being a creator?

From the outside, it looks like a glamorous life filled with travel, brand deals, and beautiful visuals.

But what people don’t see is the constant pressure to create, stay relevant, and balance creativity with consistency. Being a creator means you’re always “on” – even during moments that are supposed to be personal. It’s also mentally demanding, because your work is deeply tied to your identity. There’s no clear boundary between life and work, and that’s something you learn to navigate over time.

Advice on chasing revenue vs creating a unique voice?

In the early days, it’s tempting to chase revenue or follow trends because that’s what seems to work quickly. But in the long run, your unique voice is your biggest asset. We consciously chose to focus on building a strong identity first – even if it meant slower growth or fewer brand deals initially. Once your audience connects with who you are, monetization becomes more sustainable and aligned. Our advice: don’t build your content around money – build it around meaning. The revenue will follow. d
