

Alter egos, arrivals and reunions

April didn't ask for attention. It earned it in fragments. In small, curious shifts. In moments that made you look twice, laugh once, and then quietly take it in. If March was about connections, April leaned into transformation. Some chosen, some accidental, but all impossible to ignore.

For Manas, it started at the top. Quite literally. One day, black hair. The next, unmistakably blonde. The newsroom did what newsrooms do best: speculate. Was it AI? A filter gone rogue? A social experiment? Theories flew faster than email notifications. Manas, meanwhile, leaned into the chaos. On-air, off-air, owning it. Somewhere between curiosity and confidence, he may have just claimed a title no one knew existed... the first blonde Indian journalist on air. Unverified, uncontested, and yet, entirely on brand for April.

Yash's month unfolded a few thousand kilometres away, in a setting that felt almost too postcard-perfect to be real. Switzerland, on a short trip, delivered exactly what you'd expect and then some. Clean streets, absurdly scenic backdrops, and a deep, almost devotional love for football. A visit to the FIFA Headquarters marked a quiet personal milestone, one of those moments that doesn't need exaggeration to feel significant. But April being April, it came with its own lesson plan. A ₹10,000 cab ride from the airport to the hotel. Painful. Memorable. Corrective. The train rides that followed weren't just cheaper, they were wiser.

Back home, April found its loudest cheer inside a WhatsApp notification. No buildup. No countdown. Just a screenshot. Digit's English Instagram handle had crossed 150,000 followers. It was the kind of milestone that sneaks up on you and then suddenly feels inevitable. Credit where it's due: Roshni and Bhumika, who've been steadily building, experimenting, and pushing Digit's social voice forward. The celebration? Instant samosas appeared. Conversations paused. For a moment, metrics turned into something that was a little more tangible. It was shared pride, wrapped in paper plates.

And then there was Vyom, proving that March wasn't done with him just yet. Another trip, another building, another coincidence. At a press event hosted by Dassault Systèmes in Pune, he walked into something far more familiar than a conference room. Ansh. A school friend. Now an intern at the same campus. No algorithms, no planning, just chance doing its thing. Lunch followed. Catching up came easy. Goodbyes, less so. Some reunions don't need a reason. They just happen when they're meant to.

Not every story this month came easy, though. April hit Siddharth Chauhan harder than most. Hospitalisation isn't something you schedule, and recovery isn't something you rush. But if there's a way to measure resilience, Sid found it. Memes from a hospital bed. Jokes in between treatments. A reminder that attitude doesn't always wait for circumstances to improve. It creates its own momentum. And as April closes, so does that chapter, with his comeback already in motion.

That was April. A month of new looks dawned, new places visited, shared wins enjoyed, repeated coincidences, and a quiet kind of strength. Not loud. Not linear. Just a collection of moments that, somehow, made perfect sense and were in perfect sync together. **📅
