

Arts and crafts

Weaving, sculpting, or basket-making are among the many arts and crafts that people enjoy today. But for early people, they were necessary tools for survival. The ability to make things gave people an advantage over those who could not. For instance, making a basket meant you could carry a lot more berries home.

This stone ball is carved from volcanic rock and took about a year to make.

Stone

This was one of the first materials to be crafted by humans. The first things to be made were tools for cutting. By the end of the Stone Age, people were making a wide variety of objects, such as arrowheads, containers, figurines, and jewelry.

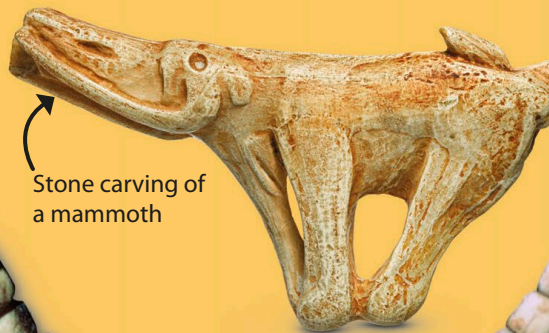

These stone earrings come from China.

This late Stone Age marble figure is from Greece.

Bone and antler

Bone and antler provided ideal material for early humans to carve with. It was easy to work, harder-wearing than wood, and there was lots of it. Things made from bone and antler included needles, jewelry, and even shelters!

Stone carving of a mammoth

This bone necklace was strung together with leather or flax; holes were made with a simple drill made of flint.
