

Forced removal

A US Army Chinook helicopter arrives to evacuate civilians from the village of Ben Suc during Operation Cedar Falls in January 1967. Possessions were limited to what could be carried.

Reaction in the US

To the American public, the military successes of war in the Iron Triangle began to pale beside the disturbing human dimensions of the refugee crisis it created. American writer and journalist Jonathan Schell, visiting Ben Suc for The New Yorker in the summer of 1967, witnessed the US destruction of the village. His reports, which took up almost the entire July 15 edition of the magazine, highlighted problems with the ethics of the American approach in Vietnam, providing arguments for the growing antiwar movement in America.
