

“War painted the living and the dead the same gray pallor on Hill 875.”

WAR CORRESPONDENT PETER ARNETT, NOVEMBER 1967

» AFTER

The McNamara Line did very little to halt North Vietnamese infiltration or the resupply of Viet Cong forces in the South.

POWER VACUUM

Following the Siege of Khe Sanh in January 1968, the Americans dismantled the entire western portion of the McNamara Line and removed firebase troops from the region. By October of that year, the whole scheme to create a physical barrier along the DMZ had been abandoned.

The lack of US military power in the area around the DMZ made it even easier for communist forces to move men and equipment along the Ho Chi Minh Trail. However, there was never another attempt to construct a defensive barricade between North and South Vietnam.