

After treatment in-country, the wounded who required additional surgery or extended recuperation, or who were eligible for medical discharge, were flown in C-141 Starlifter medical transports, first to Japan and then directly to hospitals in the US. The transportation system, coordinated by Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV), sought to utilize Pacific and mainland US resources, while also maximizing the availability of beds and resources in Vietnam.