

America, however, could never be wholly comfortable with supporting a European colonial power trying to maintain its empire. It set up the Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) in Vietnam, officially to observe French use of US military equipment, but in practice beginning a creeping US engagement in the country. By the early 1950s, commitment to the Cold War had begun inexorably to draw the Americans into Vietnam.