
DIEN BIEN

A1 Hill

One of the last French strongpoints to fall during the Battle of Dien Bien Phu, A1 Hill offers visitors a view of the entire battlefield and surrounding valleys.

Bunker of General de Castries

The capture of the French commander's bunker was a key moment in the 1954 Battle of Dien Bien Phu. The bunker has been preserved—and in places, reinforced with stronger materials—for posterity. The information accompanying the exhibits is mainly presented in Vietnamese and French.

Dien Bien Phu Military Cemetery

This peaceful burial ground contains the remains of Vietnamese soldiers who fought against the French in 1954. While many graves are unmarked, memorial walls give the names of those who died in the battle, listed by province.

Dien Bien Phu Military Museum

Containing objects, weapons, and photographs from the Battle of Dien Bien Phu, this military museum also contains some oddities—such as a bathtub owned by French commander General de Castries.

Dien Bien Phu Victory Monument

The sculpture commemorating the Vietnamese victory at Dien Bien Phu was installed at D1 Hill for the 50th anniversary of the battle.

DONG HA

Dong Ha Mine Action Center

Showcasing the ordnance dropped by American forces during the Vietnam War, the Mine Action Center in Dong Ha contains bomb fragments, unexploded devices, and photographs, as well as warnings to children to beware of mines. English-speaking guides are available. <http://landmines.org.vn/visitor-center/>

DONG NAI

Bien Hoa Air Base

A major US base from 1961 to 1973, and also used by the ARVN Air Force, this is currently an active Vietnam People's Air Force (VPAF) base. The facility is closed to the public, but visitors can get an overview from hilltop Buu Phong Pagoda west of the base. The US government is helping to clean up highly toxic dioxin, a relic of the Agent Orange stockpiled at Bien Hoa during the war.

Dong Nai Provincial Museum

A MiG-21 fighter, T-59 tank, and US Air Force Huey helicopter help illustrate Vietnam's long liberation struggle at this eclectic local museum in Bien Hoa.

Long Tan Cross and Battlefield

The Sixth Battalion, Royal Australian Regiment erected the Long Tan Cross in 1969 to mark the site of the August 1966 battle between the First Australian Task Force and the NVA and Viet Cong. Despite heavy losses, the Australian victory was their most significant encounter of the war. The current cross is a replica of the original, which the Dong Nai Provincial Museum donated to the Australian War Memorial in 2017.
