

We like milk!

Baby sea lions, like all mammals, suckle their mother's milk.

The nipples are hidden in slits on the mother's tummy. The rich milk is about 50 percent fat.

Whale's milk is about 10 times richer in fat than cow's milk.

Blubber for warmth

Many whales, dolphins, and seals live in icy places. Under the skin, a thick, oily fat called blubber protects them from the cold.

Sea lion's milk is as thick as mayonnaise. A pup will suckle for up to a year.

A baby seal's white fur helps to hide it.

Helping hair

Seals and sea lions have sensitive whiskers, which help them to find their food because they pick up on movement under the water.
