The M3's compact two-man turret gave it a slim profile, but offered very little space for the commander and gunner. The lack of a loader put additional pressure on the commander to load the main gun, as well as constantly focusing on the enemy's position and the best direction of attack. Later models were equipped with a commander's cupola to improve visibility; this version relied on periscopes and pistol ports around the turret. The driver's vision, meanwhile, was limited to a single armored port at the front of the vehicle.
