

CONFESSION 4

GAMING NO DISTRACTION

One of the longest confessions we received was refreshingly honest.

A student shared how he spent years trying to build the “perfect productive college image” - handling projects, internships, events, competitions, presentations, and endless applications.

To everyone else, gaming looked like a distraction. But according to him, gaming was actually the thing that kept him sane. Late-night gaming sessions with friends became the only moments where nobody cared about grades, placements, leadership roles or success.

It was just laughter, chaos, terrible decisions and peace. Just awesome!

CONFESSION 5

THE BIRTHDAY CAKE INCIDENT

One player admitted he once skipped his own birthday cake cutting because his squad had reached the final zone in a tournament. While his family kept calling him outside the room, he was busy yelling:

“Revive me! Revive me!”

Priorities? Questionable. Relatable? Absolutely.

CONFESSION 6

THE FAKE INTERNET DISCONNECT

Every gamer has blamed lag at least once. But one confession took things to another level.

During an intense ranked match, this player celebrated too early after a clutch kill and accidentally unplugged his own Wi-Fi router.

The team lost. Instead of confessing, he blamed internet issues and disconnected dramatically.

According to him, his teammates still believe the server crashed.

CONFESSION 7

THE “ONE LAST MATCH” LIE

Perhaps the most relatable confession came from a hostel gamer who promised himself he’d play “just one match” before studying for internals.

Seven hours later, he was still gaming with hostel friends at 4 AM, chasing a rank-up match while half asleep. Then came the impossible comeback.

A 1v4 clutch. Screaming. Tables shaking. Hostel rooms waking up. The next morning, he somehow walked into his exam with zero sleep and still passed.

His final line perfectly summed up college gaming culture: “Gaming isn’t just about winning. It’s about the people, the chaos and the memories you create.”

LOVE IN THE LOBBY

One gamer admitted she originally started playing just to pass time, but slowly began staying online longer because of her boyfriend.

According to her, the game itself became secondary. Her favourite moments weren’t victories - they were hearing him celebrate tiny wins like world championships and blaming lag for every defeat. Purest gaming romance ever?

LOCKDOWN, RANKED MATCHES & NO SLEEP

Another confession reflected what gaming looked like during the COVID lockdown years.

A student shared how he became obsessed with Apex Legends during online classes in 11th grade. He’d tell his parents he was attending “extra classes,” while secretly muting lectures and grinding ranked till 3 AM.

Looking back, he admitted the addiction probably wasn’t even about becoming a pro player.

It was because lockdown felt empty and gaming made everyday life exciting again.

CONFESSION 10

“NICE CLUTCH... NOW GET OUT.”

And finally, perhaps the most cinematic confession of all.

One gamer got caught playing during lab hours. Right when the match became intense, the faculty member walked behind him and silently watched the screen for five seconds.

Then he simply said:

“Nice clutch... now get out.”

Legendary behavior.

IN CONCLUSION...

What stood out most from these confessions wasn’t just the humour it was how personal gaming really is for students.

Behind every late-night session, fake “internet issue,” muted online class and “one last match” lies something bigger: friendship, stress relief, competition, comfort, identity and memories people genuinely carry for years.

Gaming in college isn’t always about becoming the best player in the lobby. Sometimes it’s just about finding people who make the chaos of college life a little more fun.

And judging by these confessions gamers will probably continue lying about Discord being a study app for many more years to come.
