Technology Should Feel Human

NIPUN MARYA | CEO, iQOO

Nipun Marya runs iQOO in a category where 25 years feels like five lifetimes. The CEO argues against the futurism reflex – the next quarter-century isn't about certainty, it's about readiness – and lands on a principle he wants the industry to hold steady on: whatever the tech does, it should still feel human.

How has tech evolved over the past 25 years?

When you look back at the last 25 years, it's hard not to be amazed. Technology hasn't just evolved — it has constantly reinvented itself, almost every few years. We've gone from a world where we tried to keep up with tech, to one where it quietly shapes how we live, work, and connect. The mobile industry, in many ways, has been the biggest game-changer- putting powerful technology in people's hands and giving millions a fair shot at learning, growing, and participating in the digital world.

Throughout this journey, Digit has consistently raised the bar for tech journalism in India. What sets it apart is its ability to simplify complexity- moving beyond jargon to help people truly understand technology.

How is tech going to transform our lives in the next 25 years?

If the last few years have taught us anything, it's that predicting technology is a humbling exercise. The speed at which AI emerged and reshaped industries is a reminder that disruption often comes from unexpected directions. So, imagining the next 25 years is less about certainty and more about readiness.

At iQOO, we see this as a responsibility to build products that are not just powerful today but adaptable for tomorrow- devices that evolve with changing technologies and user expectations.

But beyond performance, one principle must remain constant: technology should feel human. Technology is a powerful multiplier, and the choices we make today will define whether it truly serves humanity in the years ahead.

> Technology is a powerful multiplier, and the choices we make today will define whether it truly serves humanity in the years ahead

Any message to Digit on completing 25 years?

I must say congratulations to the entire Digit team on reaching this incredible milestone.

Sustaining leadership for 25 years, while holding on to credibility and authenticity, is no small feat. It speaks volumes about the trust you've built with generations of readers who rely on you to navigate an ever-evolving tech landscape.

As we look ahead in the future of tech, I'm confident Digit will continue to be that trusted voice along the way: curious, rigorous, and always consumer-first.