

Milestones, mischief and memory

May didn't arrive with a grand announcement. It walked in with anniversaries, cake, cricket pads, TV screens, farewells, and one dessert that clearly had other plans.

For Vyom, May came with a marker. One year at Digit. Twelve months of learning more about tech – and himself – than he claims to have managed in the 20 years before it. AI remained his regular beat, but the year also pushed him into unfamiliar territory: PC peripherals, gaming laptops, and even a phone camera test in Jaipur that, by his own admission, went rather well. Somewhere between benchmarks and briefs, Vyom found the categories that clicked. Here's to another year of tinkering, learning, and yes, May the force be with him.

Krishika's milestone carried a quieter kind of weight. A year ago, she stepped into Digit with excitement, fear, and more doubts than she had answers. Tech was new, but storytelling wasn't. Neither was the instinct to create, perform, and speak to an audience.

There were days she questioned her voice, talent, and place in the room. But sometimes, belief arrives before confidence does. For Krishika, that belief came from Manas, Narender, and Yashraj – people who helped her find steadier ground before she fully found it herself.

Narender, meanwhile, found something else entirely: form. After years away from cricket, he put the pads back on and, quite accidentally, turned into the second coming of Pollard. Twenty-four off 12 in one match. Sixteen off 9 in the next. Timing, apparently, does not expire. This is the same Narender who, last TPL season, stood injured for 11 overs, unbeaten, holding the team together like a phone at 1 percent battery. At this point, "Narender Sharma" feels too restrained. Narender Pollard has entered the chat.

For Siddharth Malhotra, May delivered a dream in broadcast format. He was featured on The Digit Show in a full segment reviewing the OnePlus Pad 4. Seeing himself on television, talking about technology, felt surreal. Seeing his parents happy and proud made it even more unforgettable. Some milestones are professional. Some are personal. This one was both.

The month also made room for people who quietly keep the machine running. Raj Kishore sir, a veteran of the video production team, celebrated his birthday in office, surrounded by the Digit team. A man of few words – and even fewer when under the spotlight – he responded in the most Raj Kishore way possible: with that familiar, beaming smile.

There was also a goodbye cake for Shreya, who became part of the team faster than anyone had really expected. And then there was Bhumika's birthday cake, which chose chaos, leapt off the table, and splattered dramatically on the floor. The replacement dutch truffle luckily behaved better.

That was May. Not tidy. Not really quiet either. Very Digit.
