

Of floods, flights and formalwear

July arrived dressed for every possible occasion. There were football screenings after midnight, birthday cake in the office, blazers in Mumbai, medical queues in Noida, flooded roads, fallen trees, a three-piece suit in London, refrigerators invading the Test Labs, and one very important helicopter that could fit inside a gift box. If June was about staying in the game, July was about showing up – sometimes polished, sometimes drenched, sometimes sleep-deprived, but always ready.

Siddharth Malhotra showed up for football with exactly the kind of enthusiasm expected from someone willing to attend a 12:30 am screening because there were six hours to kill and nothing useful left to do in office. Manas, naturally, documented the logic. Football fans do not need plans. They need a screen, company, and unreasonable kick-off timings.

Yash Verma's birthday brought the customary cake cutting, but the real celebration arrived in miniature form. One of his closest friends on the floor gifted him a Hot Wheels Airwolf helicopter model. Yash responded with a hug, proving that the coolest machines occasionally unlock very human reactions.

Appliances and Vasan: A love story

Aman and his suit against the galaxy

Mumbai, meanwhile, gave the team a rare excuse to dress like adults. Manas and Aman flew in from Noida to join Mithun, Vyom and Jayesh for a custom event execution just as monsoon fury hovered nearby. The event landed successfully, the suits came out, the blazers were flaunted, and Digitians briefly looked less like people chasing deadlines and more like people who might own the building.

Back in office, HR organised free health check-ups across an entire week. Participation was high, Priyanka and Payal were among the first to finish, and the ophthalmologist queue remained the longest on all five days. Apparently, after years of staring at screens, everyone suddenly wanted answers. The camp also offered a useful reminder: deadlines can be postponed, but blood pressure has its own editorial calendar.

Mumbai had harsher tests. Jayesh was cut off for a week without internet, electricity, cell service or a way out. Vyom faced blocked roads too, though his obstacle was a fallen tree. Mumbai monsoon does not merely interrupt plans. It edits them aggressively, then forgets to save the original draft.

Yash and Narendra say Aloha! toh Bali

Aman flew to London for Samsung Galaxy Unpacked, looking sharp in a three-piece suit beside a galaxy of AI-enabled devices. Somewhere between briefings, hands-on sessions and camera work, the suit survived too – an achievement worth recording.

Elsewhere, Yash and Narendra completed Digit's first-ever international sponsored shoot in Bali – a milestone built on years of difficult shoots, tight deadlines and late nights that refused to win. The location was new. The persistence behind it was not.

And inside Digit Test Labs, appliances arrived like an invasion. Vasan, Madhav, Vyom and Abhishek tested, measured, catalogued, verified and even helped move refrigerators and washing machines for India's Top Appliance Awards 2026. When the work became heavy lifting, literally, they decided to simply just kept going.

That was July. Formal, flooded, international, and unmistakably Digit. **📺