

worth looking at is the more than 17% figure, as these respondents remained dissatisfied with their experience, suggesting that after sales is one aspect brands should work on.

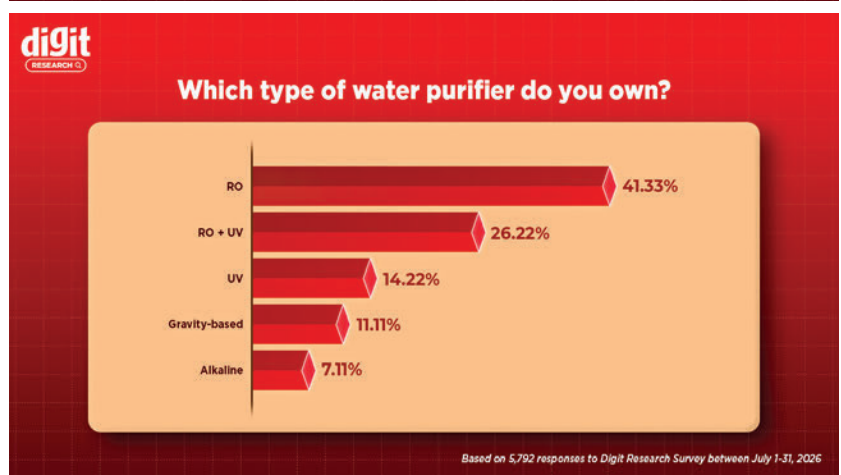

Water purifiers: RO still the default, Pureit leads the race

Moving over to Water Purifiers, it shouldn't be much of a surprise but Reverse Osmosis as the purification process remains the clear default, still used by around 41% voters. The closet after that was hybrid RO+UV systems coming in at around 26% votes. Given India's water quality, standalone UV purifiers came in lower around 14%. Meanwhile, UF and Alkaline purifiers made up the rest of the list.

Coming to brand preference, Pureit leads the race with over 35% votes. After that, we have the usual suspects in Aquaguard with 26% votes and Kent accounted for around 21% votes. One of the newer players in the market, Native by Urban Company is getting quite popular as it has already picked up 13% market share.

Security cameras: Privacy has become a major concern

Security cameras was quite an interesting category as data privacy is now on the top of the mind for a majority of security camera buyers. Over 51% called it "very important," while only 16% said they don't care.

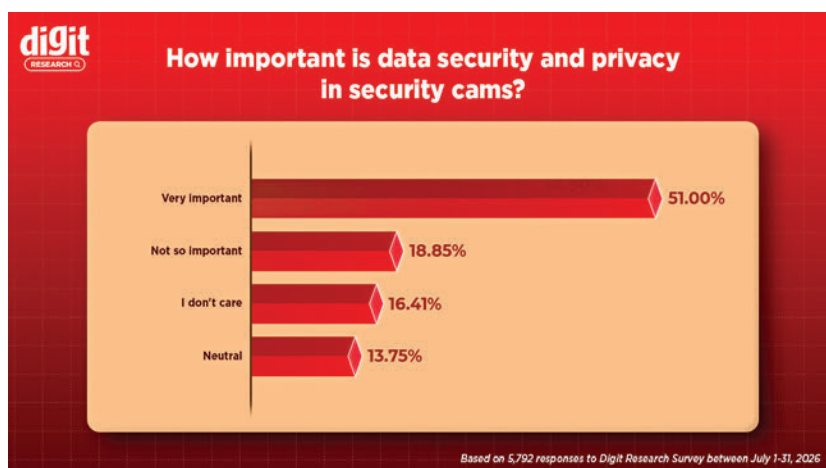

Given these findings, it's safe to assume that in today's day and age it's important for brands to do well in data encryption, having local storage options, and be crystal clear on their data policies.

Air purifiers: Clean air priority

Lastly, we also asked a few questions about air purifiers, and the insight here was that outdoor air pollution remained the single biggest driver of air purifier interest, as chosen by over 43% of respondents. Other reasons included pet dander (9%) or odour control (11%). Meanwhile, allergy and respiratory concerns also carried over a big chunk (26%) making it the second-largest motivator, ahead of general wellness (12%).

Together, these findings point to a market where the overall innovation of the format, brand trust, and privacy are increasingly the factors in appliance purchase decisions. d
